

Review for Leading man Aaron Deakins in his leading role in Shadow Division.

This south west born Actor was originally someone who was making the rounds at a few blink and you will miss it theatre performances in his home town. I watched a small premier in Plymouth where Aaron was the one who was awarded a title "Best upcoming Actor." Now, after watching Shadow Division i can see why. This actor kept the eyes open and the backsides in seats as he carried this entier film on his back and his only. I had heard that he had helped this film be created also, after a quick view of his IMDB i then was surprised to see that this "meathead" Actor was also a writer and producer, of which he had helped with in this film. While this film does also come across as a little predictable, Aarons acting and performance was strong and consistent all the way through.

Not only does this up and coming action actor look the part of someone who can handle himself, (large physique and constant angry face.)But he also seems to have skills in the martial arts side of things. One minute this actor seems to be flying through the sky drop kicking a zombie on this film, next he himself seems to be allowing himself to be dropkicked or flown around without any sort of stunt mat, something tells me this film was a true pain to make.

The action scene with this actor of course seem to be the bread and butter, but i, and others in the audience seemed to be fully enjoying this actors range where he switches from a captain on a mission for vengeance, to someone who realises that he is out of his depth. All of these things i see with this Action Actor, while he clearly still has a long way ahead of him, he is on a right start.
